As outlined overleaf the ILS is a 'not for profit' charity founded in the 1960s to promote the understanding of employment law and industrial relations and to stimulate debate in these fields. We achieve our aim by producing a first-rate Journal – the Industrial Law Journal, ordinarily have yearly conferences and hold regular evening meetings currently mainly in hybrid format in London (note: the Society has not as yet fully recommenced regional meetings since the pandemic, but hopes to do so soon). Details of our events can be found <https://www.industriallawsociety.org.uk/forthcoming-events-hosted-by-the-ils/>

We are unique in drawing our membership across the spectrum of the employment, discrimination and industrial relations community. It means that our meetings, conferences and other activities provide an excellent opportunity to consider current issues in employment law from a multi-disciplinary perspective. Our members are lawyers, academics, barristers, personnel practitioners, judiciary, trade union officials and educational establishments. We have an executive committee and officers who are elected every two years by our members.

Other points to note are:

- the Industrial Law Journal has an international reputation as the authoritative periodical on employment law, is published for the Society quarterly by the Oxford University Press and sent free to all members. Members may also register for free on-line access to both current and back-dated editions of the Journal;
- the Society is a registered charity so our conferences are competitively priced and are usually more affordable than commercial conferences. As a member you receive a significant discount. Participants at our sessions meet to hear and discuss detailed presentations on a range of topical themes;
- all of the Society's meetings and conferences offer continuing professional accreditation by the SRA and BSB.
- for a small additional fee of £7 ILS members can become affiliated to the International Society for Labour Law;

We very much hope that you would like to become a member of the Industrial Law Society. Corporate membership allows your firm/company to book up to any 10 people onto our webinars or in-person meetings for free and 5 people to our conferences at the membership rate.

If you need any further information about membership then please do not hesitate to contact the Society's co-ordinator, Jean Hughes either by e-mail jean@industriallawsociety.org.uk or by phone on 01787 463838. Our office hours are between 9am to 1pm weekdays
